The looming eurozone crisis and higher fuel prices are likely to have a long-term negative impact on Germany's economic growth, with the nation's gross domestic product likely to slow down from 0.3 per cent in 2012 to an estimated 0.1 per cent in 2013, a new study by a think-tank has forecast. 'A long-term negative impact' The study, conducted by the Institute for Economic Trends (IWF) in Berlin, looked at the factors affecting growth over the coming years. Its authors said that strong exports, a highly competitive currency and a higher euro combined to account for the majority of Germany's success over the last decade. Germany is one of the largest economies in Europe and, after the United States, the second-largest in the world. This, combined with a steady rise in output and a fast-growing workforce, have made it one of the world's most successful economies, both in the short and the long run. However, the IWF study, which was published this week, says that the country's success has come at the cost of certain disadvantages. It states that Germany's success as an export-oriented economy with a strong currency and a strong currency-management system has been one of its advantages, but this success is limited to the eurozone. A stronger currency is making exports cheaper "A strong currency has helped Germany export abroad and has stimulated its economic growth," the study said. "When the euro gains against other currencies, it makes German exports cheaper, stimulating demand and imports. This also reduces Germany's trade deficit, and stimulates domestic production and employment." It added that Germany's dominance in exporting to Europe means that any weakness in the Eurozone, or a drop in the value of the single currency, would hit the country's economy very hard. "A weakening of the euro would reduce the competitiveness of Germany's exports to the rest of the eurozone and to the rest of the world, to the disadvantage of all of us in the eurozone," the authors said. "Germany would have to put its exports on a competitive footing with foreign competitors, such as the United States and China. This would hurt export-oriented companies, jobs, and income." The country's success, however, is unlikely to last forever, the study said. "Germany's high level of competitiveness and low relative wages can work in the short run, but only up to a point," it added. "Long-term prosperity can only be achieved by a proper balance between domestic demand, imports, and exports. In the long
