Processing devices such as computers and other types of electronic devices have achieved widespread use in a variety of applications, and such devices are relatively inexpensive compared to processing devices that were previously available. These processing devices are often interconnected to communicate and exchange information. Such connections may use wired connections, such as cables, or wireless connections, such as radio frequency (RF) or infra-red (IR) connections. Devices may also communicate with each other by connecting to a network, e.g., the Internet. In some cases, the devices may be located in close proximity to each other. For example, two or more computers, a smart phone and a tablet may be located in close proximity to each other in the same room, or even in the same building. In such a configuration, one of the processing devices may be able to communicate with other devices by transmitting or receiving messages from those other devices. In some cases, devices may transmit messages to other devices. Such messages may be directed to another device within the same room or building, to a device within a local area network (LAN), or even to a device on the Internet. In such cases, messages may be transmitted in either directions, e.g., from the transmitting device to a receiving device, from the receiving device to the transmitting device, or in both directions. This article is from the archive of our partner. The Congress approved a measure on Tuesday that would allow undocumented immigrants who were brought to the United States as children to work legally, but it's unlikely to become law in the near future. A bipartisan Senate group has not been able to agree on a comprehensive immigration bill, and Congress will likely have to take a piecemeal approach to immigration reform. The bill approved by the Senate on Tuesday would allow undocumented immigrants who were brought to the country as children to become permanent residents, but many other aspects of the immigration debate are still undecided. The measure passed 65-33. It
