The best diagnostic tool is generally thought to be a specimen of the patient's respiratory secretions, but this is often not a practical option, since it is very invasive and unpleasant. A less invasive diagnostic tool is needed which would be useful during epidemics of infectious diseases, especially when oral health care services are being provided. A number of devices have been developed to detect infectious diseases, such as influenza, in a patient's respiratory secretions. Some devices are based on the interaction between the respiratory secretions and some reagent which produces a detectable change in the reagent during the presence of a particular type of microorganism. Examples of such a device are disclosed in the following U.S. patents: U.S. Pat. No. 4,190,507, Inamoto et al.; U.S. Pat. No. 4,215,037, Gayen et al.; and U.S. Pat. No. 4,321,971, D. Epstein et al. The devices disclosed in these patents generally make use of paper or other porous material in the form of a pad. A variety of microbiological detection methods can be employed using such a pad. For example, the pad can be inoculated with the microorganism, covered with a layer of reagent and incubated. A detectable change in the reagent during incubation indicates that the microorganism is present. In one method, a sample of the respiratory secretions is sprayed, collected on or distributed over a porous matrix. See, for example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,474,087, Rollmann et al.; U.S. Pat. No. 4,705,
