[explain keywords] I realize this is a really old question but I found that this should be known by someone. When you calculate the finish cost and the total cost you must use the same rule. Finish costs are the amount of raw materials that you have used on the project. The finished cost must be equal to or greater than the total costs. Total Costs are the total of all materials used on the project. The total cost must be equal to or greater than the finish cost. If the total cost is not equal to or greater than the finished cost, then you would have to allocate money to the project. If the total cost is greater than the finish cost then the part that was over will be allocated to the next project. Make sure to do the calculations before you bring on any subcontractors for your project. This will keep you from being overrun by costs. A: I agree with everything that Skyline said, but I'll add that if you're using an electronic spreadsheet, you can simply add the cost of each piece of the interior to the cost of each piece of the exterior, and then you'll have a good idea of what it's going to cost. It will tell you if you've spent too much, or if you don't have enough budget to make it all happen. A: I use the same two rules above to limit overruns. You can use this approach without a spreadsheet or any fancy computer program. All you need is a pencil and a piece of paper. Say your estimate of the total cost is $3000 and your estimate for the cost of finished goods is $2000. The first thing you want to do is make sure that the amount you estimate to spend on materials is equal to or greater than the amount you estimate to spend on finished goods. I find that the easiest way to do this is to divide the finished goods by the materials so that you can look at the ratio that you are using to build the house. If it is less than 50%, then you don't have enough money to finish the job. The next thing you want to do is make sure that your estimate for the total project cost is at least equal to the finished goods. That is, does your budget include enough money to finish the project, or do you need to find some other funding source. Q: How to remove all nested
